

Ways to Practice Self-Care

How to reduce stress and increase self-compassion during a stressful time

- ▶ During uncertain times it is normal for anxiety, depression, and for secondary traumatic stress to surface. In Psychology Today there is a great article detailing the fears that come from such events as a pandemic. Groundlessness, isolation, and identity issues can be at a heightened awareness during this time. If you are interested, please take a few minutes to read <https://www.psychologytoday.com/us/blog/the-courage-suffer/202003/why-are-we-so-afraid-the-covid-19-virus>.

- ▶ Through a trauma informed lens it is best practice to build strong and compassionate systems that are predictable, and emotionally safe for all. Building solid routines, in these uncertain times will help reduce stress as well as vicarious trauma. This is also the time to prioritize yourself, and put on your own oxygen mask first. You cannot be a help to others if you are not well cared for and regulated. It will be helpful to be able to identify your own triggers and stressors to help manage them. Be kind to yourself and acknowledge what you are feeling, it is real. This is the time to reach out for support from others.

Self Care Wheel

This exercise is designed to help you reflect and find balance in your life. Fill in how you practice self-care in each section. Then look to see if there are areas that you could be doing more.

Klinic Community Health out of Manitoba, CA put together an amazing comprehensive booklet Calm in the Storm: Coping With the Stresses of Life that might also be helpful. Please find it at <https://klinic.mb.ca/wp-content/uploads/2015/07/Calm-in-the-Storm.pdf>

A Story Thich Nhat Hanh told seems relevant right now

He shares a time during the reign of terror in Cambodia when many people tried to escape in small boats across the sea. Often the boats were small and the people many. It was time of great stress and uncertainty. One of these overcrowded boats had set sail and had crossed into open waters when a storm began. The little boat was caught in the wind and waves, and people began to panic, thinking they would all die. As they became more and more frightened, their agitation added to the instability of the boat. At that moment, one person in the boat quietly said, "Let us sit down and hold one another." The person calmly sat and held out a hand. One by one, the people began to sit and hold each other. The boat stabilized, and they were able to reach the far shore.

We are in a time of great uncertainty and stress. Fear has many around us terrified. Can we be the calm person in the boat?

In our tradition of the Science of Mind, we understand that our inner thoughts married to our feelings tend to create an outer experience. Now more than ever, it seems important to put this understanding into practice.

Can we focus on the amazing healing power of the body, the incredible Intelligence informing those hard at work, helping create solutions and offering support to those who are ill? Can we deeply feel the love of family, friends and our spiritual community and allow gratitude to wash like a healing balm all the way through us?

Let us use our minds and hearts to restore peace and trust in the boat of our humanity. Let us reach out and hold one another, knowing we are strong together.

Fear does not create safety. Love does.
